

Flowers cultivated in the Azores include bird of paradise, anthuriums, roses, carnations and chrysanthemums. Hydrangeas are also common across the islands, though their presence along roads and in gardens does not necessarily mean they are grown commercially for cutting.

Flowers you may find with local growers

The Azores have a mild maritime climate, but growing conditions vary between islands and from one site to another. Some flowers are grown outdoors, while others need the shelter of a greenhouse. A farm's selection also depends on its space, growing methods and customers.

- Bird of paradise: Its orange and blue flowers have a distinctive shape and are used as cut flowers.
- Anthuriums: These tropical plants have glossy, heart shaped spathes that come in colors including red, pink and white.
- Roses: Familiar garden and cut flowers, roses are available in many colors and forms.
- Carnations: These flowers have ruffled petals and sturdy stems. They are useful in mixed arrangements.
- Chrysanthemums: Grown in a range of shapes and colors, chrysanthemums can provide both focal flowers and smaller blooms for arrangements.

Not every grower carries all of these flowers. If you need a particular color or a large number of stems, ask a local grower what is ready to cut rather than relying on a general list of island flowers.

What makes island flowers different

Ocean influence keeps temperatures relatively mild, and rain supports the green landscape for which the Azores are known. Wind, humidity and changes in elevation still matter. A sheltered plot near the coast can offer different conditions from an exposed site higher up.

Hydrangeas are especially visible in the Azores, often forming long hedges beside roads and fields. Their blue, pink or white flower heads make them easy to recognize. They are worth looking for in the landscape, but ask before assuming that roadside plants are available as cut flowers.

For a gift or event, local availability can change with the weather and the grower's harvest. Share your date, preferred colors and the number of arrangements you need. If your first choice is unavailable, a grower may be able to suggest another flower that is ready at the same time.

Questions about Azorean flowers

Are hydrangeas native to the Azores?

No. The hydrangeas commonly seen on the islands were introduced from elsewhere. Their abundance does not make them native.

Can tropical flowers grow in the Azores?

Some can, including anthuriums and bird of paradise. Shelter and careful growing conditions may be important, particularly for plants sensitive to wind or cool weather.

Are the same flowers available on every island?

Not necessarily. Farms, growing conditions and distribution differ, so check with a grower on the island where you need the flowers.

How can I choose flowers for a visit or celebration?

Ask what is being harvested close to your date. Being flexible about the exact flower can make it easier to use stems grown locally.
