Living on a wooded lot in southwest Roanoke County has real rewards: shade in July, birdsong in the morning and deer wandering through the yard at dusk. It also means sharing space with a lot Click for source more wildlife and insects than a home on an open city street. Perdue Exterminators is based right in this part of the county, on Old Cave Spring Road, and has spent decades helping homeowners on wooded properties keep pests where they belong, outside.

Trees bring moisture and shade, both of which pests love. Leaf litter and fallen branches create harborage for spiders, ants, crickets and cockroaches. Overhanging limbs give ants and rodents a direct path onto the roof and into attics. Decaying stumps and logs can host termite and carpenter ant colonies that eventually forage toward the house. Homes near Back Creek, along Bent Mountain Road and in neighborhoods bordering Poor Mountain see these pressures every year.

Rodents are especially common on wooded lots. Mice and other small rodents live in the surrounding woods and move indoors when temperatures drop in the fall. Perdue's rodent control uses baits and traps that do not rely on toxic poisons, which helps protect pets and the wildlife many of these homeowners enjoy. Technicians also look for gaps around utility lines, decks and foundation vents to keep rodents from returning.

Practical Steps for Wooded Properties

Trim branches back from the roof and siding, clear leaf litter from foundation beds and keep firewood stacked well away from the house and off the ground. Remove old stumps near the home if possible, and keep gutters clean, since wooded lots fill them quickly and overflowing gutters soak the soil along the foundation. These changes make treatment more effective and longer lasting.

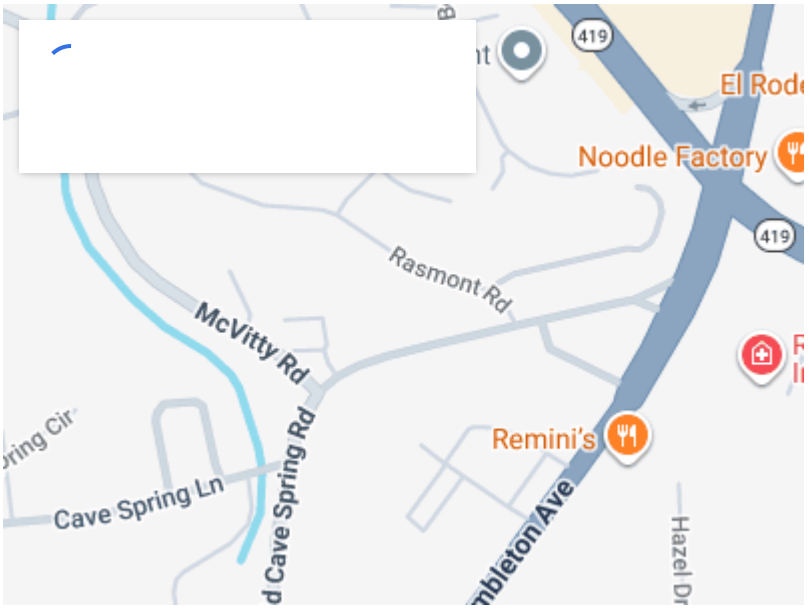

Stinging insects are another wooded lot issue. Yellowjackets nest in the ground and in old stumps, and bald faced hornets build nests in trees and shrubs. Perdue's flying insect control helps deal with nests safely.

Termite protection is particularly important here. Perdue's termite elimination comes with renewable annual warranties, a sensible safeguard for homes surrounded by the wood and moisture termites need.
