How to evaluate communication skills during your first contact

- Intake call: Notice how they explain assessment steps and timelines. Can they summarize complex topics about reinforcement or functional behavior assessment in clear English?
- Written materials: Request a sample treatment-plan template or a de-identified progress note. Look for organized headings, understandable goals, and practical parent guidance.
- Parent training approach: Ask how they teach caregivers—do they use plain language, role-play, visuals, and follow-up summaries?

Red flags to watch for

- Vague descriptions of methods: If they can't explain why a strategy is chosen or how success is measured, consider that a warning sign.

Questions to Confirm Competency in English (with sample answers)

1) How do you explain a behavior plan to parents who are new to ABA?

- Answer: I start with the goal in plain language, like "reducing tantrums during transitions," then outline the triggers, the skills we'll teach as replacements, and how we'll reinforce them. I provide a one-page summary with steps, examples, and what parents can say or do at home.

2) Can you show me how you summarize data for families each month?

- Answer: I share a brief report with graphs and a paragraph explaining what changed and why. For example, "Requests for help increased from 30% to 70% across home and clinic after adding visual prompts; next month, we'll fade prompts and practice with peers."

3) How do you adapt your communication for different caregivers or teachers?

- Answer: I check preferred language level and format—some prefer bullet points or visuals. I confirm understanding by asking caregivers to restate the plan in their own words and I adjust wording based on their feedback.

4) What does collaboration with schools look like?

- Answer: With consent, I send concise notes in clear English highlighting goals, strategies, and accommodations. I attend meetings when possible and translate ABA terms into classroom practices teachers can apply immediately.

5) How do you ensure parents feel comfortable asking questions?

- Answer: I schedule time every session for Q&A, use a shared document for questions between visits, and end with a quick recap. I invite feedback with prompts like, "What part of today's plan felt unclear?"

By using these questions and criteria, families in Endicott can confidently evaluate ABA providers in Endicott NY and select a licensed behavior analyst who combines strong ABA therapy qualifications with clear, compassionate communication.
