

New Parents in Omaha Updating Wills and Guardianship Plans In Nebraska, a person remains a minor until small law firm age 19. That detail rarely comes up at a baby shower, but it matters a great deal to new parents in Omaha, because it defines how long a court-supervised arrangement could control a child's care and money if something happened to both parents before the child grew up. A little planning now can replace that uncertainty with clear instructions. Naming a guardian is usually the first priority. A will allows parents to nominate who they want to raise their child, and a thoughtful nomination can spare relatives from arguing about it later. Erickson | Sederstrom P.C., L.L.O. handles guardianship and conservatorship matters, and its estate planning attorneys, including shareholders Joseph C. Byam II, Daniel I. Dittman, and Andrew J. Huettner, help parents choose and document those decisions. Parents who signed wills before the baby arrived should review them, since an older document may not reflect the new family at all. Money for a child needs its own plan. Leaving assets directly to a minor can lead to a conservatorship and court oversight, so many parents consider a revocable trust that names a trustee to manage funds until the child reaches an age the parents choose. Revocable trusts can also serve as a probate alternative, keeping the process more private for the surviving family. Non-probate transfers, such as beneficiary designations on retirement accounts and life insurance, should be updated at the same time so they line up with the rest of the plan. If a child has special needs, special needs planning can help protect Medicaid and SSI eligibility later in life.

Parents also need documents that protect each other. A durable financial power of attorney and a health care directive let a trusted person act if a parent is injured or seriously ill, and in Nebraska, properly prepared powers of attorney can avoid the need for a court-appointed guardianship over an adult.
